COMMERCE IN THE ARCTIC SEAS.—There is one hardy navigator who pursues a laudable ambition to explore the Arctic regions in the way in which all the early discoveries were made in other seas-by commercial ventures. This is Captain Wiggins. In 1877 he made a voyage to the Kara Sea, the Gulf of Obi and the mouth of the Yenisei River, on the Arctic coast of Siberia. His report of his experience there and the inferences drawn were that voyages could be made along that coast in summer all the way from the Northern Ocean to the Pacific, and that they might be made commercially important. An effort was made to interest the British Admiralty in the subject and to induce the government to defray the expense of an exploration that would ultimately, it was held, develop a great trade in wheat. But the government would not undertake it. In the last summer Captain Wiggins repeated his voyage, and carried a cargo from Liverpool to the mouth of the Obi and returned with another of the products of the country. He made in that Arctic bay the singular discovery that a commerce more or less irregular now actually exists between the Siberian rivers and Hamburg .- N. Y. Heraln.
